Study Hits Industry's Product Rules

By Jack Anderson and Les Whitten disqualify him from reviewing the perjury charges. He has no intention, he indicated, of withdrawing from the case...

Kevin Maroney, the deputy assistant attorney general who is examining the question of whether former Central Intelligence Agency Director Richard M. Helms gave the Senate perjured testimony, represented the CIA in a 1966 case. Maroney worked closely with Helms on the case and obtained an affidavit from him. The Justice Department official acknowledged to us that he had worked with Helms but insisted this didn't